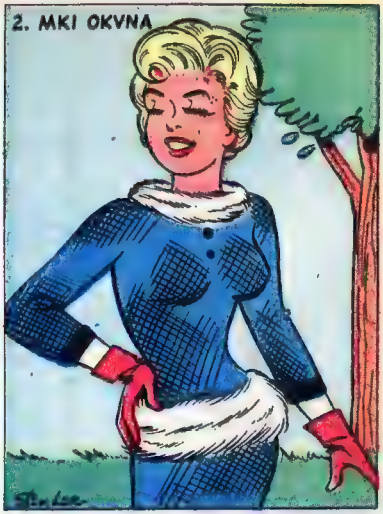
HERE ARE FOUR POSES OF MILLIE WEARING FOUR DIFFERENT HAIRDOS! CAN YOU GUESS WHICH FAMOUS MOVIE STAR MILLIE IS IMITATING IN EACH POSE? FOR THE CORRECT ANSWERS, UNSCRAMBLE THE NAMES IN EACH PANEL!



MY SHINING STAR

LIKE almost every young girl of my age, I had dreams of becoming famous in the entertainment world. I had acted in a few plays in High School and that had given me the urge to go further in my acting career . . . be it the movies, the stage, or even radio and television. I worked back in my home town for a couple of years after getting out of school . . . I had a secretarial job on the local newspaper. But the urge to become an actress . . . a famous star . . . never left me, so at the age of twenty-one, with all the money I had saved up and the encouragement of my family, I went to New York.

My father had a friend who was in the publishing business in the big city, and I went directly to him for a job. After all, I really didn't expect to find a place in the theater at once . . . that would take a lot of time, study and making the right contacts. Meanwhile, I wanted to earn enough each week to pay my living expenses, and my savings could be put aside for an emergency.

Mr. Bryson, the publisher, greeted me warmly and said there was an opening on the editorial staff of the screen and TV fan magazines which he published. I was delighted. First of all, for the job, of course . . . but also because I would be connected with publications which were in turn connected with the field of entertainment. I would be getting news of screen and TV personalities first hand, and I would also have the chance to meet agents, producers and directors who might come around the office.

And so I began my life in New York, full of enthusiasm and delight, certain that fame and fortune awaited me just around the corner. If I had only known that something else was coming my way too . . . romance! I thought I would have no time for love . . . I was going to be a career girl, and nothing was to get in my way. But romance is a mighty funny thing . . . it has a way of catching up to you when you least expect it. And try as you may, you just can't escape it!

His name was Jerry Adams, and he handled publicity for one of the larger movie studios. Jerry was in charge of the studio's New York office, and every time a glamorous star or a handsome hero of the screen came to New York on a visit, Jerry would bring him or her up to the office to be interviewed and photographed for one of our fan magazines.

In the beginning, I was excited everytime a star came into the office. I always got one of their photographs out of the files and got an autograph. My furnished room was filled with such pictures after a while. But after several months, I began to realize that these stars were really ordinary people who had gotten a lucky break in the movies, either through good looks, some talent or being acquainted with some influential person in the movie capital. When they came to our office to be interviewed, they smiled and laughed and talked like any other person who might live in your home town. I liked them for this attitude . . . I was glad they had not lost the common touch. They were, after all, only human. So, in time, I lost my excitement when a star sat near my desk, and I stopped asking for autographs.

With the stardust out of my eyes, I began to really "see" Jerry Adams for the first time. I began to notice his dark eyes, his friendly smile and his wavy hair. I began to realize that Jerry was as handsome as any of the male stars he brought up to the office for an interview. And I began to notice that Jerry spent more time standing by my desk talking to me, than he did in the inner office of the editor. It got so that I looked forward more to his arrival in the office, than to that of the latest star to be stopping over in New York.

And it seems that Jerry became aware of my new interest in him personally, for one day he stood there by my desk, smiling down at me and making my heart flutter, and asked me if I'd go to dinner with him that evening! Although it was something I had long hoped for, I hardly expected Jerry to actually ask me. I muttered a quick acceptance . . . told him my address so he could pick me up after I had had a chance to change for the evening.

I'll never forget that wonderful evening! There were places in New York I had never seen, for I had never had the money to afford such places, nor did the few boys who dated me. But Jerry knew his way about Manhattan . . . and everywhere we went, he was greeted warmly by restaurant managers, waiters, doormen and night club owners. I realized that Jerry had probably escorted many young and glamorous girls to these expensive restaurants and night clubs, and I wondered how I compared to those other girls in his eyes. At least he had asked me to go out with him, and that certainly showed that he was attracted to me enough to want to be in my company for the evening and to be seen in the chic public places of the big city.

After dinner, we went to a club and watched some delightful entertainment . . . then we danced as a famous name-band provided the music. Jerry and I danced well together, as though we had been dating like this many times already. And I was in seventh heaven!

After midnight, we were in a club located on the roof of a tall building overlooking Central Park. It was a beautiful night, and after dancing for a while, we strolled out onto the terrace Many of the windows were lit up in the apartment buildings and hotels on the other side of the park, and they made New York look like an enchanted city. We began to talk. I told Jerry why I had come to New York . . . to find fame and fortune as an actress.

"The same old story," he said. "Almost every out-of-town gal in New York came here to become a star . . . instead, most of them are secretaries, assistant editors, salesgirls. Not that I blame them, of course, for trying to follow their star of destiny to the big city. But how many of them actually make it? Not very many, I'm afraid."

I knew Jerry was right and was being completely sincere in his remarks. At the same time, he was probably trying to tell me that my own "star" would shine no more brightly than it was right now, at this particular point in my life. Perhaps I was destined to be just an editorial assistant, meet a nice boy, fall deeply in love, get married and live happily ever after. Not a bad prospect for a young girl, I had to admit.

And perhaps I knew within my heart that fame and stardom were far beyond my reach. I suppose the realization had come to me at the same time that I had become aware of my growing love for Jerry. But if I was not to have one . . . fame as an actress . . . would I have the other . . . the love in return of Jerry Adams?

The answer came moments later, when Jerry turned me toward him, held me close in his arms and said, "You're not the type to become a glamour-gal, putting on an act, trying to be something you're not . . . just hoping to impress the right people so you can get places in the entertainment world. You were meant to be loved by someone who could offer you a lifetime of happiness . . . love and a family. You were meant to be my wife, darling!"

And so, there I was in the arms of the man I had fallen in love with . . . and as he kissed me tenderly, and asked for my answer, all I could say was, "Yes, I'll marry you, Jerry . . . darling" . . . and I knew I had found my own special shining star . . . the star that was meant for a girl from a small town, who had really come to the big city to seek love and romance . . . and had found it!
